This commercial building is five stories high and eleven bays wide (the last two bays on the north end of the building are probably additions). The first story is polished granite; the next three stories are running bond-laid masonry; the fifth story is stone.

The heavily framed, flat arch entrance on the rounded corner of the building contains two sheet glass doors; five other flat arch, level framed windows also contain sheet glass. Just below the second story windows is a stone belt course underscored by a band of rondelles.

The outer bay of each end of the building's (excluding the addition) second through fourth stories contains one double hung, one-over-one window with a stone sill and flat arch, splayed brick lintel. In the inner bays, each bay of windows in those three stories is set in a keystone segmental arch. All windows (except those on the rounded corner, where in stories two and three they are sheet glass) are double hung with one-over-one lights flanked by two narrower windows of the same configuration. Above the second and third story windows are panels containing diamond-shaped stone insets.

Fifth story windows are also double hung with one-over-one lights. Grouped three to a bay, they are of uniform size. Panels containing a circle inscribed within a rectangle appear between each bay. (The addition's fenestration resembles the last and the next to the last bays of either end of the original structure.)

Above these windows is another strip of rondelles; these appear just beneath the braced roof cornice, atop which is a balustrade.
